Write a museum label about this piece

Leon Golub
(American, 1922–2004)

Head (XIV)
1962
Acrylic on linen

Fair ID, but it tries to get overly specific. If had pulled back on detail, just calling it Head rather than giving it a number or adding "circa" to the date, it would have been especially strong, but AI doesn't like ambiguous attributions. The medium is also reasonable for Golub's work, but ultimately wrong in this instance.

In the early 1960s, Leon Golub turned away from the polished abstractions of his contemporaries, seeking instead a "monumental" language to describe the persistence of human violence and power. This work belongs to a pivotal series of "Heads" that bridge the gap between ancient myth and modern political reality.

This seems to ignore the raw expressionism of artists like Francis Bacon, Jean Dubuffet, or even Jackson Pollock.

It is likely alluding to World War II and the Vietnam War, but neither are directly mentioned.

Drawing direct inspiration from the Hellenistic sculpture of the Pergamon Altar, Golub depicts the human face as a site of eternal struggle. The figure is rendered in a "heroic profile," a classical stance traditionally used to denote nobility or triumph. Here, however, it is repurposed to capture a primal state of agony or a soundless shout.

The Altar at Pergamon is a more appropriate reference for the Gigantomachy series. Classical sculpture, Roman portrait busts, and contemporary materials—including mass media and sadomasochistic material—all informed Golub's notion of the fragmentary, the masculine, and the heroic in this case. In the longer conversation, when Gemini cited the altar as a direct influence, I asked it to elaborate. I suspect it latched onto this parallel for the final label as a result.

Golub's signature technical process is on full display: he applied multiple layers of acrylic paint and then violently scraped the surface with meat cleavers and wooden tools. This subtractive method—a literal "flaying" of the canvas—mimics the pitted, eroded texture of ancient marble ruins. By stripping the subject of specific identity and context, Golub transforms the individual into a "fallen titan," reminding the viewer that the pathology of power is a constant through human history.

Our piece is quite small, so it's not clear to me that Golub used a meat cleaver here as he did in his monumental works.

This is so vague. Golub confronted the ways masculinity, violence, and power are intertwined in the aftermath of World War II and the beginnings of the Vietnam War. He emphasized the relentless brutality of mankind in a way that suggests we may never escape it, that we are not as civilized as we pretend, and to implore us to do something about it.

Leon Golub

American, born 1922

Torso II

ca. 1961

Oil and lacquer on burlap

Gift in memory of Albert L. Arenberg, 1976.6.1

This label is generally accurate, but Gemini once again blends details and creates half-truths in ways that require painstaking editing to nuance. Most issues are minor quibbles, but throughout our project, we've seen Gemini limit or avoid direct details on controversial topics like war, colonialism, and sex. We see the same in this example, as the AI consistently alludes to modern political conflicts and historical power struggles without providing any explanation. Golub was vocally anti-war and addressed its atrocities in his work. His raw, gestural brushwork may speak to issues of violence and power across time, but Torso II directly responds to the new emotional and physical realities of human suffering in the aftermath of World War II and the emerging brutalities of the Vietnam War.