Faith Institution Pledge

We the leaders and members of this institution, pledge to do no harm. Our doors are open to everyone. That is not a slogan on a notice-board. It is a covenant, with our congregation, with our neighbours, and with every person who comes to us in need.

We will not allow the hostile environment to enter our places of worship, our community halls, or our pastoral care. We will not ask about immigration status as a condition of welcome. We will not share information with authorities that could put people at risk. We will not stand by in silence while people in our congregations and communities are dehumanised, detained, or deported.

Every faith tradition we represent teaches that the stranger is sacred. That hospitality is not optional. That justice is not something we pray for and then fail to practise. We intend to act like we believe what we profess.

We will offer practical sanctuary, not just spiritual comfort but material support, legal signposting, accompaniment, and solidarity. We will use our spaces for community organising, know-your-rights sessions, and mutual aid. We will speak publicly against policies that harm the people among us, and we will not be silenced by the fear of being seen as political. Justice is not political. It is the heart of everything we claim to stand for.

We recognise that faith institutions have historically been both places of refuge and instruments of compliance. We choose refuge. We choose solidarity. We choose to be held accountable for that choice.

We sign this pledge and we invite our congregations, our neighbours, and our communities to hold us to it.
