MP Pledge

I pledge to do no harm. That means I will not vote for laws that expand detention or strip people of their rights because of where they were born.

I will not authorise policies that turn our schools into surveillance, our hospitals into checkpoints, our councils into border guards.

I will not stay silent when cruelty is called common sense, when harm is called management, when making life unlivable for families is called restoring order.

I will not hide behind the whip, behind procedure, behind the phrase "it is complicated," because it is not complicated. You either harm people or you do not.

I will use my office to challenge hostile environment policies wherever they appear, in legislation, in guidance, in the quiet agreements that never make the news but ruin lives every day.

I will listen to the people most affected, not as problems to be managed but as my constituents, my neighbours, people whose knowledge comes from having survived what I have only ever debated.

I accept that neutrality is not available to me. Abstention is a vote. Silence is a position. And my constituents have every right to know exactly where I stand, not in careful phrases drafted by advisors, but plainly, publicly, in words I am prepared to be held to.

I make this pledge freely, and I invite you to hold me to it. Because if we have reached the point where an elected representative must be asked to promise not to harm the people they serve, then this pledge is not too much to ask. It is long overdue.

I sign my name. I mean it.
