Uploaded Document

They swam laps, floated face to face talking, explored some of the inner pools, and splashed about for over an hour. When Miako climbed out she realized she was tired and sleepy. Stepha came out of her changing room and looked at her sharply.

"Your room should be ready by now," she said. "Go and take a nap. I'll be sure you're called for dinner."

Miako wanted to perform the rite of inexpressible thanks, but instead she resorted to the inadequate words that non-Felitta insisted on, and walked back down to her room. The bare space was now furnished with a thick round rug with a blue radial pattern beneath a couch, bed, and desk. There was a painting of Mount Kibbith seen from the sea, and another of fields of crocuses popping up through a snowbank; they were quite good. All of her things had been brought from the lodge. She opened her bag and took out her flute case. For ten minutes she played a melody that ran idly through her brain like a stream through a meadow. But her fingers grew sluggish, so she set the instrument down and flopped onto the bed, and was almost instantly asleep.

* * *

A young Tongat woman woke her, touching her gently on the shoulder. Miako blinked up at her and rubbed her eyes. The woman couldn't have been more than two years past choiceday, dressed in black leggings and the Tongat long tunic, dark green with gold trimming. Her expression was either reverent or fearful.

"What time is it?" Miako said.

"About 15.00. Dinner is being served. President Piggatherer sent me to ask if you would like to join us."

Miako realized she was starving. And that she had to pee. "Can you show me the facilities?" she said.

The woman led her farther down the corridor to a washroom and waited. When Miako came out they went back to the common areas, where a large crowd had shoved the furniture out from the center of the seating area and were sitting tightly-packed together on the floor, passing bowls and plates back and forth. Her guide led her to the far side of the clump, where Chass sat erect and impassive with a little bubble of space around him. She sat down to his right and he greeted her quietly.

Someone passed Miako a thin, round flatbread about a foot wide. It was warm and soft, fragrant of fennel, cumin, and garlic. Before she could decide whether to start gnawing at it or ask someone what the protocol was, Stepha sat down on her other side, crossed her legs, and accepted a large bowl of thick stew from the person beside her. She filled a ladle with the steaming mixture and gestured for Miako to hold out the bread. With a swift, practiced swoop she dumped the finely-chopped meat and vegetables onto the bread and swirled them with the ladle to distribute them evenly.

"Fold it in half and go to it," she said. A man sitting in front of Stepha handed her a loaf of her own and she repeated the procedure, then passed the stew bowl away.

The stew had just a hint of heat, and it was delicious. Just about the time Miako was wishing she had something to drink her young guide came back to hand her a tall glass of dark beer. She accepted a small bowl of pickled red onions halfway through her sandwich and finished all of it. Stepha handed her something like a tureen filled with chocolate-covered dried fruit; she took a small handful and reached across Chass to hand it to the Archivist, who she had just noticed was sitting on the Mediator's left.
