Political Party Pledge

We the leadership of this party, pledge to do no harm. We will not use migration as a bargaining chip, as a dog whistle, or as a tool to win votes at the expense of people's lives. We will not compete with other parties to see who can sound toughest on immigration while knowing that the human cost is paid by people who cannot vote and cannot answer back. We recognise that the hostile environment did not arrive by accident. It was built, bill by bill, speech by speech, manifesto commitment by manifesto commitment, by political parties that chose electoral advantage over human dignity. We will not continue that tradition.

We will not whip our representatives to vote for legislation that expands detention, removes legal protections, or embeds immigration enforcement into public services. Where such legislation is proposed, we will oppose it openly and explain why. We will not treat the rights of migrants and refugees as a matter of political calculation. Rights are not negotiable. They do not bend to focus groups. We will ensure that our party's policies, at every level from local government to Westminster, are tested against a simple question: does this cause harm to people on the basis of their immigration status? If it does, we will not support it. If our existing policies fail that test, we will change them.

We will listen to migrant-led organisations, to people with lived experience, and to the communities most affected by hostile environment policies. We will not speak about them. We will speak with them, and we will act on what they tell us. We will hold our elected representatives accountable to this pledge. It is not enough to sign it at conference and forget it in committee. We will make this a living commitment, reviewed, reported on, and open to scrutiny.

We make this pledge publicly because the public deserves to know where we stand. Not in the language of strategy, but in plain words we are prepared to be held to.
